John Dorahy's first grade career took off just one week after his seventeenth birthday when he entered the cauldron that was senior rugby league in the fierce Illawarra competition. Sydney clubs very quickly realised what a priceless piece of football wizardry 'the kid' from the gong was.

His composure and confidence under pressure earned him the nickname of 'Joe Cool'. Older team mates were amazed at his kitbag of attacking skills. That he went on to attain the highest honours of state and national representation was no surprise to team mates who played along side him or to opponents who were so regularly made to look pedestrian by his change of pace.

Calm in the Cauldron is a warts and all account of a career that spanned both sides of the world, and is a must for fans who long for the game as it existed in the good old pre-television, rough, tough, blood and guts days of the Greatest Game in the World.
